To support their commitment to offer a whole-person benefits program for their employees, an employee benefits provider analyzed their benefit offerings to identify opportunities to deliver more equitable access to personalized care. The company identified key challenges impacting the health of their employee population, including high rates of obesity, depression, anxiety and hypertension. Their population health data also signaled that care avoidance might be an issue for their employees.

Compounding these concerns was that more than 98% of the company's employees live in counties with partial or no provider coverage.¹ Many employees were unable to receive the timely care they needed, waiting weeks or even months for a primary care appointment, which led to delayed interventions and increased costs for both employees and the company.

The company also recognized that many members who did have prior primary care physicians were unsatisfied with their providers. Despite their access to in-person care, members who encountered treatment bias due to language barriers and affordability concerns were becoming care-avoidant, leading to gaps in care that resulted in poor health outcomes and increased downstream costs.

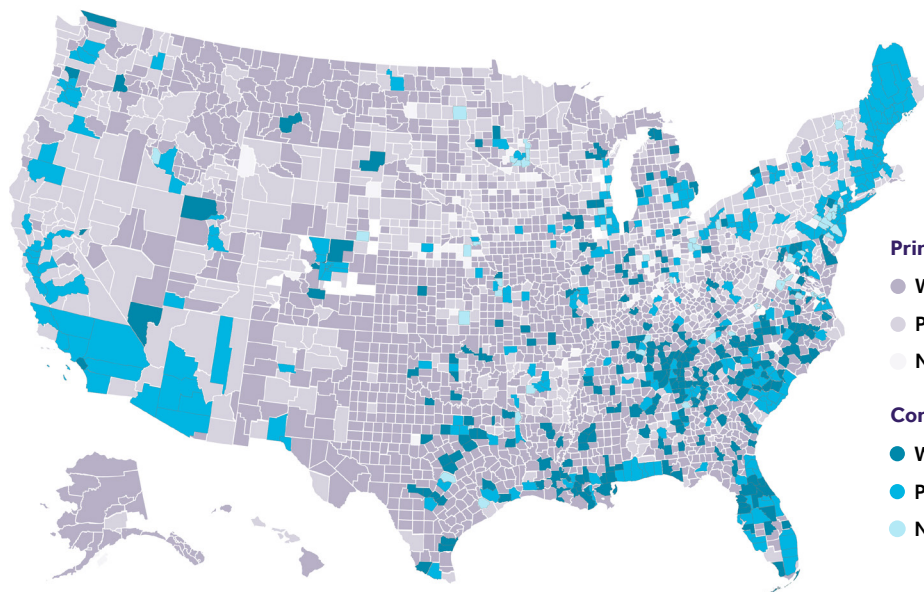

Recognizing these challenges, the company sought a way to provide a flexible, customizable benefits strategy with an emphasis on access, affordability, convenience, prevention and employee choice. They wanted an integrated solution that could alleviate access barriers, decrease treatment bias, consolidate patient care into one seamless experience and ultimately close the coverage gap in order to create a healthier, more satisfied and engaged workforce.

Expanding access to high-quality primary care

The company initially partnered with Teladoc Health to offer the Expert Medical Services virtual care solution, then quickly expanded to include General Medical, Mental Health, Nutrition, Dermatology, and Back and Joint services. As their partnership expanded and employee engagement grew, they continued to identify opportunities to enhance their benefits package and virtual care strategy in order to provide their employees with exceptional whole-person care. Building on this foundation of care and collaboration, they implemented Primary360, which provides access to virtual primary care providers, as well as targeted preventive screenings and appropriate treatments to identify and prevent gaps in care.

The company's trusted partnership with Teladoc Health means that their employees are now able to access convenient primary care appointments with high-quality expert providers, leading to more timely interventions, appropriate preventative screenings and early diagnoses, resulting in cost savings to the plan member and the company. Together, the employee benefits provider and Teladoc Health are collaborating to break down barriers to care for the company's employees by embracing a holistic approach that emphasizes whole-person health, equity and access to care.

Virtual primary care helps address healthcare disparities and prevents unnecessary costs through preventative care, leading to savings for both our organization and our employees. Our cost-benefit analysis has shown that the savings far outweigh the cost of the service – it's actually too expensive not to do it. Virtual care is here to stay.”

Primary360 helps employees take control of their health

Utilizing the American healthcare system can be challenging — 70% of Americans feel that the healthcare system is difficult to navigate⁴ — but Teladoc Health's care coordination teams simplify the process by streamlining administrative operations, facilitating data sharing and communication between providers, curating referral options, scheduling appointments, translating and answering member questions.

By transforming the member experience from a series of isolated appointments into one single, cohesive, continuum of care, Teladoc Health has helped this employee benefits provider achieve high engagement rates, with participating employees averaging between 12-15 interactions with their care teams annually, using the unlimited messaging available with Teladoc Health's programs.

Driving engagement, program utilization and cost savings with a member-first approach

To drive engagement, the company promotes their virtual care solutions through several channels including their internal benefits intranet and email notifications as well as Teladoc Health home mailers and web promotions. Highlighting the financial and health benefits — including that the first annual visit is at no cost for all employees — has proven critical to their mission to increase employee engagement.

This employee benefits provider has achieved exceptional results in terms of both program utilization and cost savings. Over half of their Primary360 participants return for follow up visits.¹ If Primary360 had not been an option for them, 22% of participants would not have sought care and 44% would have gone to urgent care.² The primary and preventative care offered by Primary360 has helped the company achieve cost savings by reducing the costs incurred by urgent care visits and delayed interventions.

Beyond episodic issues, we're talking about an entry point into the healthcare system. Employers are taking a fresh look at their benefits package and evaluating equity and total rewards holistically. Virtual primary care is one tangible action that can be made to improve access on the ground immediately for employees and families while at the same time achieving goals around personalization and flexibility”
